Flournoy: Asia Will be Heart of U.S. Security Policy

While the United States is confronting terrorism and hostile regimes in places like Afghanistan, Iraq, Iran and Libya, leaders also are looking eastward to shape U.S. security policy for the long-term, the Pentagon's top policy official said last night. "When future historians look back at this era, I am convinced that the rise of Asia will be noted as the central geo-strategic fact of our time," Michèle Flournoy, undersecretary of defense for policy, told a packed room of policy experts at Johns Hopkins University's "Rethinking Seminar" here.

Brigade Leaders Cite Value of Intelligence

McKim said the idea that "every soldier is a sensor" still holds true, and that a woman soldier on a female engagement team could be the person who learns a critical piece of information. "That one thing might be the key to opening up why people are fighting in a particular area," he said.

No Signal in Afghanistan? University's iPad Language App Will Still Work

U.S. soldiers in Afghanistan and parts of Pakistan frequently have trouble talking with local residents, who speak Pashto, which has 44 letters and its own unique calligraphy. Now there's a free iPad app that provides a tutorial, and it will work even in remote areas because the entire program resides on the tablet computer. "We assumed some users will be in the military, who will use it in areas without any data connection," says Sukhrob Karimov, an information and communication technology specialist at Indiana University's Center for Languages of the Central Asian Region. "So we decided to build it so all the sources are in the app. Once installed on the iPad you can use it anywhere."

You will be undergoing a pre-application on-site language skills assessment.

Vermont courts seek standards for interpreters

Linda Li often interpreted court proceedings for Chinese immigrants facing deportation or caught in family disputes.. She grew up in Hong Kong speaking Cantonese and English and later learned Mandarin. But when she started interpreting those languages in Vermont's courts seven years ago, she struggled to pick up another language spoken in the courtroom: legalese. These days, foreign-language interpreters working in Vermont's courts nearly always have some legal training, as well as a Black's Law Dictionary. But the judiciary has yet to standardize requirements for interpretation.

Appalachian holds Russian language institute for high school students in July

High school students who have been studying Russian online through the N.C. Virtual High School have an opportunity to attend a two-week institute at Appalachian State University focusing on the Russian language and culture. Appalachian's 2011 StarTalk North Carolina Student Summer Institute in Russian will be a two-week, residential immersion Russian language and culture program held on campus July 18-31. The residential immersion program will help students further develop their oral, reading and writing skills. In-class and out-of-class activities will center on the theme of Discover the World of Russian Fairy Tales and connect it with the art and music of Russian culture.

'Mission possible' to teach the police English

Teaching a foreign language in India was an uphill task as a majority of trainers came from states with very heavy accents and some just detested the language because they found it tough to speak. After five days of training in the language at Delhi's Police Training College, the trainers were correcting their seniors while speaking in English.

Interpreters sought to bridge language gap with storm victims

A week and a half after deadly storms hit North Carolina, the destruction is still evident at Stony Brook. That's the development where four children died as a result of the storm. Many of the residents there are Hispanic and don't speak much English, and that's created even more difficulties. David Marshall is one of a handful of interpreters helping to bridge the language gap. "If I'm just speaking something you don't understand, how can I connect with you," Marshall said. "I'm not saying it's impossible, but we have a huge challenge here."

College campuses add language immersion programs

Colleges and universities nationwide are creating and expanding existing language immersion programs, under which students live together while learning a language around the clock. Dustin Cowell, who teaches Arabic at Wisconsin-Madison and is chair of the Department of African Languages and Literature, says foreign-language immersion programs are effective because the language becomes a part of the students when they use it to express their feelings or to talk about ordinary, everyday activities.

Cuts Threaten Fellowships, Foreign Language Tutorials

Unless the Education Department acts to spread out painful federal cuts among a broad set of programs, UCLA may be forced to eliminate some foreign languages with small enrollments, such as Czech, that are offered in advanced tutorials as well as to reduce staff and training programs in international education. "These programs are essential for ensuring U.S. global competitiveness and national security, and for our knowledge about the world beyond the United States," said Randal Johnson, vice provost for international studies at UCLA, a Brazilian film scholar and fluent Portuguese speaker who began learning the language under the fellowship programs that would be affected.

109 state programs terminated: Four University degrees eliminated

The Board of Regents unanimously approved the Academic Program Review results determined by the Regents' Academic and Student Affairs Committee on Wednesday, with a recommendation to terminate 109 programs statewide. Of the University's 31 programs under review, four will be terminated entirely and three will be consolidated. The terminated programs include the master's degree program in geography, the bachelor's degree in Latin, the bachelor's degree in German and the master's degree in educational technology and leadership. The University is projected to save about $357,800 by terminating Latin and about $143,000 for German, according to the Regents' report.

Optimus keyboard speaks your language, whatever it is

The Optimus' big specialty lies in its keys. Each and every key cap is actually a small colour display screen. That means that the included software is able to configure what is being displayed on every key at any given moment. Typing in another language? The characters for that language are what will be displayed on every key cap. They can display Cyrillic, ancient Greek, Georgian, Arabic and many more character sets.

Faculty considers offering language certificates

Though discussions of a proposal to offer foreign language and culture certificates for undergraduates will continue next semester, faculty have questioned the rationale behind offering such programs and the ability of language departments to accommodate the increased enrollment the certificates could bring. The University does not offer minors, but the proposed certificates would essentially function as minors in a foreign language. To receive certification, a student would be required to take six language and culture courses focusing on a specific language, work or study abroad in a country where the language is spoken and maintain an online portfolio of work, wrote Katherine Bergeron, dean of the College, in an email to The Herald.

Turkey To Prepare Diplomats With Armenian Language Skills

An Istanbul university's language academy is organizing the only courses in Armenian at the post-secondary level as part of an effort to enhance regional dialogue between businesspeople and academics. "Turkey has become a major player in the region, socially, culturally, economically and politically. Thus we decided to teach regional languages rather than the classic foreign languages such as English or French," said Serdar Dinler, director of Kadir Has University's Center for Lifelong Learning, which will start teaching the courses in May at its Neighboring Languages Academy.

Learning to live in a globalized world

Globalization is important to us because our economy is global. To survive and thrive we need to market goods and services beyond our borders. Products are, Thomas Friedman reminds us, created in component parts in various areas, assembled elsewhere and marketed from yet another location. We are globally interdependent in production and globally dependent for successful marketing and distribution.

Queens assemblywoman's multilingual pamphlet aims to help new immigrants navigate Flushing

A Flushing lawmaker wants to break down the language barrier between newcomers from overseas and the neighborhood's old guard, one key phrase at a time. Assemblywoman Grace Meng \(D-Flushing\) is creating a multilingual and multicultural pamphlet providing immigrants with a crash course in English and locals with a way to communicate. "It's important to bring different cultures together. We don't want people to feel excluded," said Meng.
